ETHNOGRAPHY OF GLOBAL CHRISTIANITIES

Spring Quarter 2010

Office Hours: SSB 275, Tuesday and Thursday, noon - one

COURSE GOALS

While, since the very beginning of anthropology as a discipline, there have been ethnographies of self-described Christian populations and anthropological works that have addressed themes often associated with Christianity, it is only very recently that the anthropology of Christianity has developed into a sub-field; one of the hallmarks of this newly emerging subfield has been the richness and sophistication of many of the ethnographies associated with it. This course serves as an introduction to this new body of literature, and includes such topics as: as what is the anthropology of Christianity and why has it taken so long to develop; what are the world-historical conditions that have given rise to the sub-field's object of study; how are we to theorize conversion, both of individuals and of social units; what is the role that representation and language ideology plays in Christian religious practice; and what forms of subjectivity does Christianity engender?

GRADING

Grades will be assessed based upon three sets of material, all of which will be given equal weight:

- Research Paper: The first set will be an eight to ten page mid-term research paper, due in class on May 18th; this paper, while based on independent reading, should incorporate applicable course readings and address course themes.

- Take-home Final: The second set will be a take-home, open-book exam, which will address the course readings; unlike the research paper, this should not include independent research.
- Response Papers: The third will be short response papers, which will consist of a) a one paragraph synthesis of the arguments and evidence present the day's reading, and b) a question that you feel arises from this material. While they have no particular 'due date,' you will be expected to turn in six of them over the course of the class, the top five of which will be graded; all responses are due at the beginning of the class who's assigned readings they are addressing, and no late papers will be accepted. No more than one response paper may be turned in per week.
- Extra Credit: There will be opportunities for substantial extra credit, including the possibility of making a class presentation based upon one's research paper.
